CALIFORNIA'S FLOATING GARDENS. Curious Sights at Santa Barbara and Elsewhere. Not only the mainland, but the islands of California, which rise from the sea like submerged mountain peaks, have wonderful floating gardens through which vessels often plough with difficulty in entering the small harbors which dot the coast. At Santa Barbara, says a writer in the Sunset, the entrance of the bay is a maze of floating vegetation, and the islands off the coast, especially Santa Catalina, are more or less surrounded.

The floating gardens are formed of long streamers of kelp, which, attached to the bottom, grow upward to a distance of fifty to 500 feet, throwing out broad leaves and air-bulbs, which act as so many balloons to support them. The effect of this is to give a perfect forest of broad green leaves, rising upward and presenting a sharp contrast to the blue water in which they grow. Graceful in appearance, they turn at every whim of the tide; pow floating directly upward, their leaves high water, and caught again reaching away in long streamers, they are among the most striking and beautiful objects of the submarine world. When in shore the huge plants assume a vertical position, and become floating gardens in reality. In the bay of Avalen they present so many attractions that boats opportunity to observe the wonders of the cean world These boats are all provided with large plate-glass windows set into the bottom so the observer can sit in the boat and gaze down through the window and see intensified small animals. The glass, as suggested, magnifies objects, and in floating along one can almost imagine himself under the water and roaming at will in these gardens of the sea. Each leaf or frond is covered with patches of color, which represent varied animals or plants; OMAHA & ST. LOUIS the floating garden is a fish about a foot in length, so grotesque in shape that it is almost impossible to distinguish it from the weed. Its head and back are covered with tentacle-like growths, while its color is an exact imitation of the weed. This curious fish builds a nest in the kelp by winding the weed in and out, forming a ball in which the eggs are deposited and the young reared.

At night the scene is often a strange on down through the glass window, as nearly all of the animals of the garden are lightgivers, where during the day the sun's rays illume them, now mystic lights on an infinite variety of forms play, and the kelp Ger. beds are scenes of light and beauty be need yound power of description.
